DAYTON

DAYTON, the county seat of Montgomery County, Ohio, is beautiful in its location at the confluence of the Mad and Great Miami rivers.

The first habitation upon the site of the present city was in 1786. Nine years later it was laid out and named Dayton, in honor of Jonathan Dayton, one of the original purchasers, who was most active in organizing the movement. The village progressed slowly, but the bridle-paths of early days were destined to become thoroughfares of a great city, and the important streets of today are named and known as monuments to the memory of its prominent organizers.

The city of Dayton has passed through several disastrous experiences. It has suffered from flood and epidemic, but nevertheless, has steadily expanded from a quiet town to a city of over one hundred and twenty thousand inhabitants, and is now acknowledged as one of the most energetic and progressive of American municipalities.

It is famous as a city of character—regularly laid out in broad streets and avenues, with uniformly artistic public buildings, business blocks, palatial homes, and religious edifices—all denoting a highly developed sense of civic pride, as well as material prosperity.

Dayton is pre-eminently a manufacturing city—the home of the National Cash Register, Computing Scales, Electrical Appliances, etc., etc. Its manufactures are so varied in character that each extends the other aid, making it a city of activity—always full of vigor. Its location on the Miami & Erie Canal, and the unrivalled railroad facilities, being directly connected with several great trunk lines, afford ready communication, and the products of all manufactories are sent to all parts of the world, and notwithstanding the variety of goods manufactured, Dayton is unquestionably one of the cleanest, most attractive cities in the country.

There are many public institutions contiguous to the city that contribute to its prosperity. Among them the National Military Home, covering 640 acres, with many fine buildings, and will accommodate six thousand veterans. The supplies for this Home, as well as all Military Homes throughout the country, are manufactured here. It is the greatest of its character in the world.

Dayton is the garden spot of the Great Miami Valley.
